

It's not enough just to get children into school. The education they receive must be of good quality. Good-quality education can protect children from the impact of conflict and become a positive force for peace. Trained teachers, manageable class sizes and appropriate curricula can turn schools into a nourishing force that gives children opportunities and hope for a better future. It can encourage children to respect values and give them the confidence and ability to question intolerance and conflict. Ensuring the quality of schooling must be a priority from the outset.

Save the Children